the Emperor occasionally worked.

During the construction of this vessel, Peter the St. Petersburg, and making his first voyage and best. there, more especially as that measure was strongly recommended by his merchant, Mr. Lusses, of Amsterdam, who had, in that case, promised him a letter to his correspondent in Russia, Mr. Jeremy Mayer, who would procure him a good cargo.

The scheme gave much pleasure to the Czar, as he liked the man, so that he not only en-couraged him in it, but likewise gave him a honest, mercantile people, who would co-operate with Mr. Meyer in furnishing the cargo, he had worked on at Sardam, commanded by his favorite tar. Peter hurried immediately home in his work ing dress, a garb well suited to the scene he was going to act, and had arrived at his cottage pelace, not far from the 'Change, (still entered with reverence by those who admire real greatness) before Weebes had got all ready to come

A Mr. Blane, captain of the port, the same to whom Peter had recommended the skipper, went on board without discovering his function, and after inquiring the name of the ship, etc., asked him it he had not a letter for him from a friend, who had now got home himself, and would show him those civilities in person which he had at Sardam committed to the care of another. Weebes was highly delighted to find he had a friend and acquaintance in a strange country, and hurried with Blane to see him, after begging that gentleman to help him to smuggle ashore a few presents to Michailot's family everything around him, that he had no idea of his power to procure the promised cargo, and seemed somewhat impatient to see Mr. Mayer.

The Czar, in the meantime, said he must call his wife before they proceeded any farther, who would be happy to see a friend who had been kind to him at Sardam; and that amiable princess appeared, on be ing sent for, with retreshments on a salver in the style of Russia. Weebes was more struck with the fair Catharine than with anything he had yet seen, and taking his pipe out of his mouth, which he was smoking, according to custom, not only gave her a hearty smack but a familiar slap on the shoulder, exclaiming that Peter was a lucky dog, and had made no own and Blane's pockets, and thrown into the frow's lap, telling her at the same time that a piece of Hollands in the number would make such shifts as never yet covered her fair back. and she would lick her lips after an excellent cheese made by his own frow for the occasion.

While Peter and Catherine were highly enjoying this natural scene, his favorite, Prince Menzikoff, whom none durst stop, abruptly entered the room, on some pressing business, dressed in his ribbon, star, etc. and had like to have spoiled all, as the skipper jumped up, and asked the Emperor, in whisper, who the great man was, and what he wanted. "Money," replied Peter, in the same low voice, "for some timber we have got from his estate, as you know, these gentry are always needy;" and, under pretense of paying him, went out for a moment and dispatched the prince.

However, he was not equally successful in keeping up the deception a short time afterward, when the guard being relieved, a circumstance the Emperor forgot to prevent, although he had ordered them to keep out of sight, the Field Marshal, Butterline, the captain of the guards, marched into the room, and announced the change in a loud voice of military etiquette. This second unexpected interruption overcame Peter's patience; insomuch, that he forgot himself so far as to stamp with his foot, which sent the marshal right about faster than he came in; but the sport was over; for, on looking round, Peter saw his Sardam messmate stuck up against the wall, with his cap in his hand. and his pipe dropped at his feet; and all he could now say could no longer persuade him that he was the ship-building merchant he had so long passed for. "No," said the honest tar, "I see that I have been making so free with the Czar himself, and am quite unhappy at the smack and slap I gave the Empress, for it must have been her whom I treated so rudely. Peter, after a hearty laugh, soon dispelled his tears, by sending for Catherine to receive his apology, on condition he took another kiss at the end of it, and stayed to dinner with him, this city. Long experience enables us to mainwhen he would conduct him to 'Change and introduce him to his merchant. The Czar was better than his word, both here and in Holland; for he not only presented Weebes in person to Mr. Meyer on public Change as his particular friend, but made him a present of his first cargo, sending, at the same time, an imperial edict to the customh use, that the ship St. Petersburg, ou which the Czar had worked, should have liberty, as

During the construction of this vessel, Peter inquired of Weebes for which trade he intended her when ready, and was answered by the seaman that he had heard so much of the great encouragement offered by the Czar of Muscovy to those who frequented his new port and city, that he had some thoughts of naming the ship the St. December and making his first years.

PETER THE GREAT. While Peter the Great worked incognito as a shipwright at Sardam, in Holland, to acquire that knowledge which must ever cover him with immortal honor, he contracted a sort of friendship with a blunt, honest skipper named Wee bes, who had a ship building there, and on which letter to a particular friend in St. Petersburg, who would show him every civility, and make him acquainted with his family, a set of prain, and give him, for certain, a hearty welcome, if he was not arrived to do it himself. Weebes that ked the Russian shipwright for his kindness with a hearty squeeze of the hand, and did arrive at St. Petersburg soon after the Emperor, who was working in his admiralty on the south bank of the river, and communicating to his people the knowledge he had so nobly acquired, when a new Holland ship saluted it, which he instantly recollected to be the same
